FedEx Express, a subsidiary of FedEx Corp. (NYSE: FDX) and one of the world's largest express transportation companies, announced that it is collaborating with Neolix, a leading company in autonomous technology, to test an autonomous delivery vehicle in China. This is the first time in its operations in China that FedEx has partnered with a local Chinese technology company to test the use of a driverless vehicle. This is the latest FedEx effort to embrace technological innovation and deploy autonomous vehicles to embrace sustainable and intelligent logistics in China.

The unmanned delivery vehicle is zero emission, all electric with L4 level autonomous technology which means it:

Incorporates vehicle self-driving tech with internet and intelligent cargo box tech, allowing for AI intelligent dispatching, all-round monitoring and cloud-based management.

Offers multiple safety features with a maximum cargo capacity of approximately 500 kg and a range of 100 km on a full charge.

Is equipped with a technical system that can handle complex road conditions and traffic light recognition during the delivery process.

Supports driving in sunny, foggy, light rain, night and other conditions.

Additionally, the cargo box of the autonomous vehicle can be converted into a temperature-controlled compartment and a smart parcel locker.
