

district) and within walking distance of CTA bus and rail lines, making it easily accessible and convenient for customers.

“Chicago is a critical market for international trade, and the pandemic has caused a further increase in demand of our services due to the surge in online shopping,” said Nemer Abohasen, VP and General Manager, DHL Express – Midwest U.S. “We’re thrilled to be able to extend our capabilities in the heart of Chicago as part of our thriving retail strategy, which allows us to bring our industry-leading services closer to our customers.”

The new facility will help DHL manage the solid volume growth in the Chicago market – which has already increased 45 percent over the same period last year (Jan – June), largely driven by Business-to-Consumer e-commerce shipping as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic.
