The positive and negative plates of lead-acid batteries are commonly made of lead antimony alloy. The active substance of the positive electrode is lead dioxide, and the active substance of the negative electrode is sponge like pure lead. The electrode plate is divided into paste type and formation type according to its structure and active substance formation method.

The paste type electrode plate has smaller volume, lighter weight, easier manufacturing, and lower price compared to the formed electrode plate at the same capacity. Therefore, it is widely used; The disadvantage is that the active substance is prone to detachment during charging and discharging. Therefore, its lifespan is short, and the advantage of forming a type of electrode plate is its structure.
