Since ancient times, Chinese working people have known how to raise silkworms and reeling. At the time of Qin and Han Dynasties, the handicraft industry of making silk sponge from secondary cocoon was very popular.

This method of handling secondary cocoons is called flocculent method. The basic points of operation include repeated beating to crush the silk clothing.

This technology later developed into beating in papermaking. In addition, in ancient China, lime water or plant ash water were commonly used for degumming of silk and hemp, which also gave enlightenment to degumming of plant fiber in papermaking. Paper is developed with the help of these technologies.
